PREAMBLE.

Within the compass of humanity there is nothing which touches more powerfully the heart of the true philanthropist, than the destitute, forlorn condition of the poor Widow and Orphan. Bereft of their natural protector, exposed to the merciless buffetings of a selfish world—the one, with the finer sensibilities of her sex, cramped in her exertions to secure a maintenance—the other, with powers and capacity yet undeveloped, tossed about by the fierce waves of privation and hunger, and unguided impulse—they present the strongest claims to the sympathies of the good and benevolent. No charity, therefore, can be better applied than that which has for its object the amelioration of the condition of the Widow and Orphan.

It would be a supererogatory task to point to the religious obligation, or to the duties and responsibilities that grow out of the inequalities of the social state, in order to prove more convincingly the sacredness of this cause. For as long as the faith in the "Holy One" shall be our guide, teaching us, that we are all children of one Heavenly Father, as long as charity, "the attribute of Heaven," shall animate our being—so long will the Widow and the Orphan be foremost among those who enlist the unwavering solicitude of every good Israelite.

But whilst we recognize and admire each individual effort, to render cheerful the home of the Widow, and to protect the Fatherless, the precarious nature of such private relief must be obvious to every reflecting mind. A union of forces is required. The isolated sacrifices of the individual may prove insufficient, while the united exertions of the many, founded on a permanent basis, will effect the desired end.

In view of the increase of the Jewish population, and the too often fatal acclimating ordeal through which so many have to pass, an Institution for the relief of Jewish Widows and Orphans has become a serious want. The existing Jewish charities, seconded by the private liberality of benevolent individuals, have been found insufficient to meet all demands. True, therefore, to the spirit inculcated by an Holy Religion, and inherited through a long line of ancestors, the Association for the reliefo f Hebrew Widows and Orphans has been founded. It is encouraging to bear witness to the uniform zeal manifested in the formation of this society. May the deep felt interest marking its incipiency, distinguish its future, and we may safely indulge the hope:
